Much of the review for this first objective focused on the Foundations of Public Administration course, as this is the course that provides the theoretical baseline for students regarding the policy life cycle. The course is centered around this foundational concept. Students spend the entire class familiarizing themselves with each step of the policy lifecycle. Research is based on a series of scaffolded assignments that build to a larger piece of intellectual capital focused on an area of public administration in which students work/plan to work. These smaller research briefs and larger research paper provide direct evidence to demonstrate that all MPA students have a strong grasp on the policy life cycle, and are able to apply these theoretical models to contemporary developments in public administration. One issue that students raised is that they did not believe that the foundational concept of the policy life cycle were reinforced in subsequent classes. These comments are indirect evidence suggesting that core theoretical concepts from the foundations course could be better reinforced in other courses. In conclusion, MPA students all demonstrated an ability to review scholarly literature on policy life cycle, summarize steps of policy life cycle, explain the way in which these steps are interconnected, and apply the policy life cycle to their public administration area of interest; however, students have not been provided a consistent opportunity to do these things in subsequent criteria.
